Are most students who have behavior violations doing so repeatedly? Do they typically start with level one violations and then move to level 2 or 3?

There's a lot the school seems to be responsible for and the time taken for a teacher to be all things to a few students who are disruptive to the education system seems to take away from the students who are there to learn. I'm concerned that school and all it's resources are being used for the few who are not there to learn. The fact only a few parents are on this forum tells me there is no investment from the parent(s) to help their own children. The school can do so much. The rest of the student body suffers as a result.

How often are restorative practices used prior to suspensions currently? How many teachers are educated in restorative practices by percentages? How often do you use ACCORD for mediation?

Does our district have to pay for these alternative placements?

How can we get this message out to more parents. So important to know all the steps and efforts that have been made to help correct the unwanted behavior? Sadly, there are not many parents participating tonight.

I believe at some point you do all you can and parents have to avail themselves of the information that is made available. – ANONYMOUS
